I would like to know if the serial number is the same for the whole product. About the Kontakt 5 With Serial Number I already have Kontakt 5 and I would like to have the serial number of the version of Kontakt 5 With Serial Number that I have.Q: Modeling a pointer to a pointer What is the correct way to model the relationship between objects A and B in this situation? I could pass an A* to a B* constructor (via a pointer of A), but this seems error prone: B* is the interface and client does not know how to correctly (formally) deal with pointers. It's the responsibility of the client to release the interface object. I could also initialize B with an A* and initialize the A that B is pointing to, e.g. struct A { A(const std::string& name) : name(name) {} virtual void foo() = 0; }; struct B { B(const A* parent, const std::string& name) : name(name), parent(parent) {} void bar() { this->parent->foo(); } void foo() const {} std::string name; A* parent; }; However, I still have to initialize A with the name. struct A { A(const std::string& name) : name(name) {} virtual void foo() = 0; std::string name; }; struct B { B(const std::string& name) : name(name) {} void bar() { this->parent->foo(); } void foo() const {} A* parent; }; What is the correct way to model the relationship in this situation, where the client should never know how to deal with a pointer? A: I would do this: struct A { A(const std::string& name) : name(name) {} virtual void foo() = 0; std::string name; }; struct B { B(const A& parent, const
